The language of icons

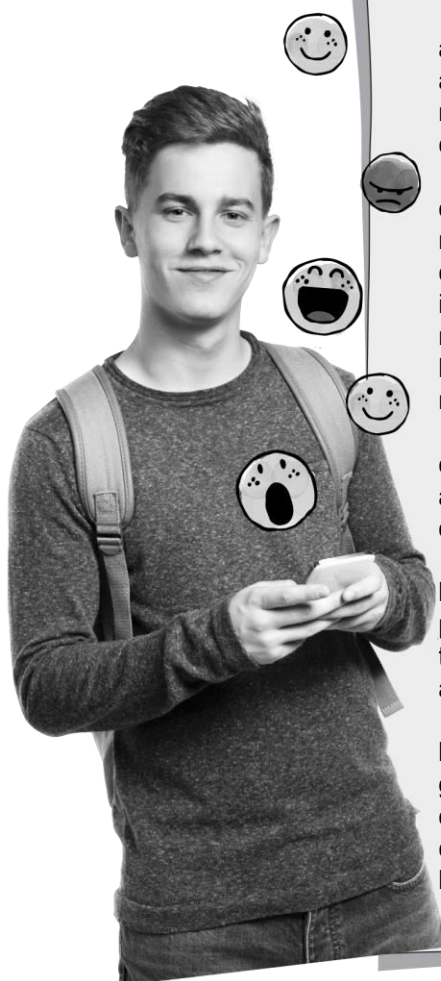

These days, the fastest growing language on the Internet isn't English, Spanish or any of the world's major languages. In fact, it's emoji – a language made up of small animated icons. On the Internet today, and especially in social media, it's impossible not to come across emoji – and it's quickly becoming one of the main ways we communicate online.

The idea of using icons to communicate online or in text messages started in the early 1990s with 'emoticons'. These were made up of combinations of punctuation marks and/or letters – and people usually used them to show emotions. For example, a colon and a bracket made a happy face. As technology developed, though, so did the icons people used. Emojis first appeared in Japan in the late 90s when a mobile phone manufacturer installed a small number of them on one of their models. They were a huge success, and soon emojis started to appear in online chatrooms and on messaging services.

At first, like emoticons, emojis showed emotions – with little yellow faces with various expressions. Nowadays, though, there are emojis for everything from food and drinks to animals and weather conditions. And they're hugely popular. In fact, in a recent study, over 76% of adult Americans admitted that they use emojis daily!

So, why have emojis become so popular? One reason is that emojis bridge the gap between face-to-face and written communication. When we're face-to-face with a person, it's easy to see what mood they're in without needing to ask them. Online, though, you can't see a person's facial expressions or body language – unless they use an emoji!

Also, emoji is an effective way for people to communicate with others with different languages. Since emojis are pictures, they can be understood by everyone. So, this gives us all a huge common vocabulary that we can use to communicate online. For example, it's common to see foreigners use a combination of emoji and English to communicate on English-language social media and forums. So, in a way, emoji is becoming the world's first universal language!

- 1 All emoticons included at least one letter and one punctuation mark.
- 2 A Japanese company created the first emojis.
- 3 The majority of American men and women write at least one emoji per day.
- 4 The writer believes that emojis are a good replacement for body language.
- 5 Different emojis exist for different countries.

Hey Maya,
Guess what! I've just booked a place in Space Camp for this August, and I was wondering if you'd like to come, too. I think you'd love it!
The camp starts on 1st August, and we can stay for two or three weeks. Which would be better for you? Also, we have the option to stay at the camp, or get a bus there each day.
Ask your sister if she would like to come. I know that she's a space fan, too!
So, what do you think?
Let me know soon,
Jordan
