The Sumatran Tiger

Earth is home to over two billion different species. Unfortunately, some of these species are in danger of becoming extinct. One such species is the Sumatran tiger from the island of Sumatra in Indonesia. It is an endangered species and there are now fewer than 400 of these amazing creatures left in the wild. They are the smallest of the tiger species on the planet and have thick black stripes on their orange fur. Unfortunately, the number of Sumatran Tigers has dropped due to hunting and deforestation. The main reason why people kill Sumatran tigers is because they want their body parts and skin.

The tigers are also losing their habitat and food because people keep cutting down a huge number of trees. There are several things that people can do to protect the Sumatran tiger. To start with, they can donate money to a charity that carries out conservation work in Sumatra to protect the tigers and their habitat. If they can't donate, they could volunteer for organisations either by helping with conservation or collecting money. We can also try to stop people from buying products which contain parts of this tiger. This way, fewer people will want to hunt these animals. We can also ask governments to make stronger laws on hunting and deforestation in Sumatra. If everyone works together, we can help save the Sumatran tiger before it's too late.

- 1 There are more than two billion animals on our planet.
- 2 Most Sumatran tigers die due to deforestation.
- 3 Deforestation means there is less food available for Sumatran tigers.
- 4 There is no conservation programme for the Sumatran tiger.
- 5 Governments are currently creating laws to protect this tiger.
